After years of dreams and negotiations, the territory of Nunavut was established in Canada's Eastern and Central Arctic on April 1, 1999. The authors, leading authorities on the politics of the Canadian Arctic, pay particular attention to the federal government of Nunavut's innovative organizational style - especially the decentralization of offices and functions (normally located in a capital) to communities across the territory.

Manufactured in Nunavut provides the first comprehensive accounts of the look that resulted in this remarkable accomplishment. They describe how this new authorities was designed and implemented, and critically assess whether decentralization has shipped "better" government for Nunavut.
