Air Force Doctrine Document 1 states, "Atmosphere forces should be controlled by an airman who maintains a broad perspective in prioritizing limited possessions across the range of operations."

Therefore, "centralized control by an airman" turns into the essence of airpower's basic tenet, centralized control and decentralized execution. This study concentrates on the origin of U. The search eventually evolves into an analysis of the doctrinal evolution of centralized control by an airman from Globe Battle I through early World War II. airpower's primary tenet, especially with regard to its essence.S. After an ineffective program of airpower culminating in the Allies' defeat at Kasserine Move, centralized control of air forces by an airman became codified into official doctrine.

The search begins with the American military experience in the Allies' North African advertising campaign in late 1942, the turning point for the adoption of airpower's core tenet. This study attempts to get the origin by examining the occasions surrounding the American Air flow Service's first combat encounter in World War I, the Battle of St. Next, it examines what the classical airpower theorists concluded on the subject of centralized control by an airman as a way to determine what shaped the interwar doctrine with which Army Surroundings Forces entered World Battle II.
