West Bengal has a long custom of successful small-level and informally organized enterprises. The Liberalisation Plan of 1990 necessitated the sectors to garner competitive power to be able to sustain them and to provide employment in a sustainable way. There is a big market potential of the industries. This book studies garment making and little engineering items manufacturing informal sectors of West Bengal. Moreover they are providing employment to numerous people living within the geographical boundary of the clusters in which they are situated. The closure of many public-sector units and consequent fall in structured sector work necessitates the emergence of informal sector as the potential of employment producing sector in West Bengal. Drawing important lessons from decentralized production in West Bengal, this book will be needed for scholars in the field of decentralized production, policy makers as well students of Economics.
