A complete centralization of provision of public services had increasingly led to different problems in solutions delivery. Most developing countries engaged decentralization policy as part of development strategy. Consequently many countries have applied a decentralization policy to provide effective public assistance delivery and regional self-rule. To assess actual implementation, a study were carried out at district level in Ethiopia. The findings demonstrated that decentralization at district level remains challenging by plenty of problems and a high down hierarchical relationship between sector offices and program units. In addition, it describes mechanisms steps to make decentralization meaningful and improve provider delivery. This reserve explains in detail the condition of decentralized service delivery, with regards to the required institutions and their functionality, the power/authority of regional governments, the financial and human resources along with the level of community participation.
