This book is an analytical study of financing and public service delivery challenges in a decentralized framework. Using family members survey statistics of usage expenditure, an evaluation of utilization or advantage incidence of public shelling out for sociable sectors in India is normally accomplished, covering education and wellness sectors. The advantages of decentralization always come with conflicts and trade-offs. The evaluation is completed by distilling the prevailing studies in this region, and via an empirical investigation of general public finance data at different public sector levels in India, in addition to in some selected developing countries. By unpacking the procedure of decentralization, the authors see that 'unfunded mandates', due to the asymmetry between budget and functions at regional levels, certainly are a major problem. It also provides critical insights into the effectiveness of public expenditure, through benefit incidence evaluation of education and health care services in India.
