"The Southern Sky" provides an intimate watch of the expatriate globe of French colonialism and exploitation of the Vietnamese as their demands for independence grows. The corrupt globe of politicians, law enforcement, and violence are brilliantly uncovered, framed in the tempestuous love affair of the young doctor and her Corsican lover, in the equatorial placing of 1928 Saigon. She threatens to inform the Hanoi authorities, so something must be performed to silence her. In Saigon, the devoted doctor goes to work at the federal government medical center assisting Dr. Monin, sails for home to testify against the detective and the corruption, promising Dr. She buries herself in her function and avoids the tries of the young lieutenant, her shipmate on the lengthy journey from Marseilles, to woo her. The sinister chief of the Surete, Inspector Arnoux, comes after her in a rickshaw chase through the dark rainy streets of Saigon, to the floating village on the river. Since Bazin had told Andrea about the corruption of the Saigon officials, the doctor becomes a liability. When Andrea tries to break off her destructive romantic relationship by staying away from Bazin, he methods her into starting her door during the Chinese New 12 months, Tet. He forces himself on her and as they lie in bed, political assassins who had followed him, break in and murder Bazin. Andrea pulls herself together and works harder. She assists at a nearby clinic, then finds it destroyed by the French military in their battle against terrorism. Initially, they clash over the treatment of workers, however, his rough worldly ways earn her over and their passionate affair creates a welcome scandal in Saigon culture. A divorcee doctor, Andrea Monin, comes after her altruistic father's footsteps to 1928 Indochina. Also, she stays out of the expatriate decadent social life in Saigon until she meets the rugged Corsican director of labor, Jaquez Bazin. When he attempts to strangle her, she stabs him in the attention with her long barrette pin. Poulaine and the youthful earnest lieutenant, she'll come back. Poulaine, a French armed service colonel expatriate who's gone native. The scandals break and Dr.
