From growing their children, parents grow themselves, learning the lessons their children teach. Growing up", then, is as much a developmental procedure for parenthood as it is of childhood. While countless books have already been written about the challenges of parenting, nearly all of these position the mother or father as instructor and support-giver, the kid as learner and looking for direction. as time passes it transforms in impressive, surprising ways. However the parent-child relationship is more complicated and reciprocal; As our kids develop up, and we get older, what used to be a one-way circulation of instruction and support, from parent to child, becomes rather an exchange.voluntarily and involuntarily, with intention and serendipity, frequently through resistance and struggle— What lessons do we take from their website and incorporate into our worldviews? We start to learn from them.are embedded in their evolving human relationships and shaped by the rapidly transforming world around them.frequently despite our own emotionally fraught resistance— With Growing ONE ANOTHER Up, Macarthur Prize-earning sociologist and educator Sara Lawrence-Lightfoot offers an intimately detailed, emotionally powerful accounts of that experience. Building her publication on a series of indepth interviews with parents around the country, she offers a counterpoint to the usual parental advancement literature that mostly worries the adjustment of parents with their infants' How are our perspectives as parents designed by our kids?an education built about witness, growing, intimacy, and acceptance. rhythms and the ways parents weather the storms of their teenage progeny. The lessons parents study from their offspring—watching that fundamental connection shift over time. from what they have observed of life that people, perhaps, never experienced? From these parent portraits emerges the form of an education composed by young adult kids— The focus here is on the lessons emerging adult kids, ages 15 to 35, show their parents. "Growing ONE ANOTHER Up is abundant with the voices of real parents telling their own stories of raising kids and their children raising them; The amount of do we find out— Parents and children of all ages will acknowledge themselves in these evocative and shifting accounts and look at their own growing up in a revelatory new light.
