Hearing Krishna describe the nature of the Self and it's really relation to existence through the entire text to Arjuna continuously evokes sort of primordial epiphany, as if the wisdom contained in the Gita is definitely innate to all or any man, but don't understand it because of the numerous sensory distractions and mirages we concern ourselves with that act as veils shielding us out of this wisdom. The Gita removes these veils, and to those souls who've an intuitive knowledge of the Self they'll notice these veils being removed.
