Two key figures from a group of leading scientific specialists serve as the focal points of the investigation, British pharmacologist Arnold Beckett and German biochemist Manfred Donike. Predicated on extensive multi-national and multi-lingual archival study, this book examines the development of scientific knowledge within the international anti-doping community that coalesced during the second fifty percent of the twentieth hundred years. Hence, this book presents a nuanced evaluation of the establishment of the structures and initiatives in the global fight doping in sport. From the 1980s onward, the international sport program relied heavily on their network of anti-doping laboratory specialists in maintaining and advancing a rigid testing regime. After assisting early anti-doping initiatives in the late 1960s and 1970s, they truly became extremely influential in such leading sports activities organizations because the International Olympic Committee and the International Association of Athletics Federations.
