They believe, “Parenting wasn’t supposed to be this hard. They’re tired of repeating themselves a thousand situations. Parents don’t have to look any further. Time to end power struggles for good! Therefore many parents yearn to get rid of power struggles making use of their child.” This can all transformation with Rein in Your Rascal. Things parent can expect to change: Toys being set aside the first time kid is ask. Bath period comes off with out a hitch. Siblings quit bickering. Foods are peaceful. As a parent coach for over 25 years, Janada Clark offers helped a large number of parents get rid of the daily power struggles that drain them. Other parenting books present theories. They’ve found the answer that offers simple, concrete strategies that they can remember, apply and enjoy the result. They’ve tried “period outs,” taking away toys, yelling or even threats. Theories are hard to remember and often abstract. Nonetheless it continues to become a struggle.
