As a mother of two children on the spectrum, with over ten years' encounter as a psychologist specialising in childhood autism, Raelene Dundon has all the tips you'll need. Part One provides methods to tell kids of different age groups and development levels about their diagnosis, including photocopiable and downloadable worksheets designed to help diagnosed children understand autism, and gives advice on what to do if indeed they react in a negative or unexpected method to the news. What's the right way to inform them? Should you inform other people too? Telling your son or daughter about their autism diagnosis can be challenging. In this concise book, she models out case studies, good examples and resources which will equip you to create your own informed choices and help all of your family to live well with autism. Can they end up being better off for understanding? Component Two explores the pros and disadvantages of sharing the diagnosis with others, including family members, friends, school staff as well as your child's classmates, and manuals you through how to proceed if others hardly understand or accept the analysis.
