Through photocopiable worksheets and actions kids are taught about different types of touch and in what settings, where on your body, and for how long touch is suitable with each group. The lessons in the publication look at different sets of people that the kid will probably encounter such as for example close family members, teachers, peers, strangers and doctors. This is a practical educational resource to help teach the social rules of touch and personal space to children and teens with Autism Spectrum Disorder with the aim of keeping them safe and helping them to understand what are appropriate interactions in family, educational and community situations. The book also contains discussion on how best to teach the child to recognise if somebody touches them inappropriately and what's appropriate when it comes to self-touch.
