'how do you consider she felt? Packed with 60 stories exploring real-life circumstances, this book will be an essential device for parents, caregivers, teachers, and other people wishing to enable young people on the autism spectrum to acquire great social skills. As teens consider these questions with adults, they will begin to have the ability to place themselves into someone else's shoes and consider how their activities and behaviour may influence those around them. Each story is followed by questions such as 'what else might he did? Teenagers and teenagers on the autism spectrum are, like everyone else, surrounded by complex sociable codes and rules that govern everyday interaction, but have a lot more problems in interpreting them.' and 'why do you consider they were upset?' alongside practical strategies for parents on how best to initiate constructive discussions. Created with both mother or father and teen in mind, every story outlines a real-life scenario that young people about the autism spectrum are likely to encounter. This process will equip them to transfer this invaluable understanding and confidence to other everyday activity circumstances. Reading cues such as sarcasm, idioms and body language often presents an impossible challenge, but this book of realistic and thought-provoking stories provides essential help.

Very beneficial I acquired this when I suspected that my girl had autism. She's since been diagnosed as having an auditory processing disorder. It looks like it would become a good companion reserve to Timm's work, but as a standalone, I price it at the nice, not great and not excellent level. Since she doesn't always process info she hears properly, it can affect her socially. Good content, little guidance This has good content regarding situations. The stories are great for anyone that needs help improving their cultural skills, whatever the reason. Four Stars Excellent book for professional use! However, she's still benefited from the books. Five Stars Great book! Hardly any guidance is provided.
